

Published based on Plans for Chicken Coops That are Minimally Recognized

Plans for Chicken Coops That are Minimally Recognized

Image by terrom via Flickr

Things to be considered in planning your chicken coop

There are many places throughout that have laws regarding residents to keep some chickens and there are those that are resolutely refusing. Even if your town will allow you to have some chickens, your neighbor might oppose to it. So there are chicken coop designs that you can find to help you with this problem. There are several chicken coops that may camouflage as a recycling bin or any other structure. You can also design it with slats to make it appear like a compost bin.

You can also select stealth mode that mixes with the environment and this is a better solution compared to others. Another option you can perform is planting around the chicken enclosure. The plants you will be selecting might keep your coop concealed all year round. But then, this does not provide a great hiding place when it comes to predators that might be lurking nearby. You can trim a hedge rose or other plants and this method is probably the best. Roses are edible so when your chickens nibble a bit, they will not be mistreated.

Moreover, do not plant round the side that faces your place. This will help you enjoy watching your chickens. You will also need to look for chicken coop designs that are more of an application shed or other structure that fits perfectly for the yard. Just paint the exterior part and match with your house's color to keep it more interesting. Your neighbors will view out their window so if they see something that is nice to look at, they won't complain.

The 'stealth' chicken sheds can eventually be used with a few different designs and this helps in covering the chicken run so your chickens can't fly out and go around the neighborhood. With this setting, you can also protect them from aerial predators such as hawks and eagles. You also have to ensure that the run be tall enough so you can lift the covering easily to access them or for cleaning.

Hens make a little bit of noise when laying eggs, so if you have neighbors that don't like this, you can offer them fresh eggs with them when your hens start to lay eggs. They may never complain about it once they tasted it.

If your neighbors find that chickens are truly great, then you can even help them get some themselves. You will never know, at one point you will be sharing chicken stories and egg recipes with your neighbor.

You can also find this article published on Plans for Chicken Coops That are Minimally Recognized, and on the tag pages building a chicken coop, chicken coop, Chicken Coops, chook house.